

I oppose the FCC's attempts to loosen Broadcast Ownership rules. The media is already too homogenous and bland. Allowing the same conformity peddling companies to own more of what we see, hear and read will endanger our democracy and further dumb-down the content we consume. Innovation in the media can come through other routes other than ownership. Moreover, it is the media outlets with a smaller presence in America, such as the BBC, AFP and independent radio that lead the country in innovative programming. The possibility of BIGGER media companies in America should not be allowed given their track record.

I have written my representatives in Congress to overrule any loosening of rules you may attempt to implement. If you do not heed the public's mass opposition to these rule changes, I believe you will raise the question of why the FCC should be independent in the first place.
